Dear Jonathan,

I lead a political party registered five months ago, Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them).¹ We're planning to contest 30 seats at the 2015 general election. Our public consultation document² outlines 18 areas in which the interests of men and boys are assaulted by the state's actions and inactions, although men collectively pay 72% of the income taxes which finance the state and its institutions – including the BBC – and women just 28%.

I'm constantly being asked by supporters why I've yet to be interviewed on Men's Hour, given that I've appeared in recent months on over 15 BBC television and radio programmes including Woman's Hour, Daily Politics, and The Jeremy Vine Show.³ I've tried to contact Tim Samuels on at least two occasions – the last time, recently, through his production company – but he hasn't had the courtesy to respond.

I see that Men's Hour presents itself as being for the 'modern man'. To my mind the term 'modern man' refers to men who are unaware (or uninterested) that men's and boys' interests are relentlessly assaulted by feminism, a hate-driven female supremacy movement which assaults so many of the pillars of civilized society.^{4,5} I suggest it's long overdue for Men's Hour to allow an alternative narrative on men's issues, one that doesn't simply parrot the feminist narratives found on Woman's Hour. I look forward to hearing from you, or from one of your colleagues, in due course.

Yours sincerely,

Mike Buchanan
PARTY LEADER
