Effective male contraception is long overdue. It would finally mean men wouldn't be tricked into fatherhood by women who become pregnant by not taking the contraceptive pill, while telling their partners they are taking it.

Effective male contraception would also free men from the possibility of paternity fraud. Far too many men are unknowingly supporting children who are biologically not theirs.

It's a scandal that the Crown has never prosecuted women who've carried out paternity fraud. The Child Maintenance Service alone learns the identity thousands of these criminal women every year, when they claim x is the father of their child, the man in question has the sense to demand a paternity test, and is found not to be the father. All these women

All these women should be prosecuted.

The solution to paternity fraud is simple and cheap, and would reduce paternity fraud - compulsory paternity tests at birth. We've been calling for such tests in our election manifestos since we launched in 2013.
